At the 2006 census, its existence was noted, but its population was not reported. Photo: Wikimedia Commons Cemeteries were among the last places the native Hawaiians knew, the study shows. Prior to the visit of the first Europeans, the people of Hawaii buried their dead on the ground, often within the space of a single village. Cemeteries became the only way of burial in the mid-1700s when the islands were colonized by European traders, and the Honolulu Cemetery and Mausoleum was completed in 1841. Photo: Wikimedia Commons The report was published in the Proceedings of the Biological Society of Washington and is being presented by Heather Albers, a marine archaeologist from San Diego State University. She developed the study with a group of scientists from Australia, India, Japan and the US. Despite the potential for indirect contact with Hawaii, the only known native burial ground has been demolished, with only a few headstones and graves remaining. The team looked at Hawaiian cemeteries from the mid-19th century to the 1930s, when the Polynesian Cultural Center was established and burial was moved to the center's mausoleums. More than 40 sites were studied, including the Howard Memorial Cemetery, the largest cemetery on the island of Oahu. The cemetery includes space for 241 burials, although many of the graves have been cleared. "The actual number of burials there is not known," Albers told SciDev.Net. "I don't think anyone actually knows whether it is 241 or not, although we do know it's a lot." The death rate for the indigenous people, mostly from infectious diseases, was f678ea9f9e
